

CHAPTER V CONCLUSION AND RECOMMENDATION

5.1. Conclusion

Everyone uses dialects to communicate in a standard of living. The proper use of communication in social situations is known as the down to earth dialect. In the discourse action hypothesis, illocutionary concealment arises when the listener comes short to distinguish the speaker's illocutionary points, the listener does not get a handle on what the speaker is looking to achieve with his words, and consequently the act of discourse appears short. The TV series "The Diplomat" used in this article reveals some of the explanations for future actions made by the characters. The main consideration topic focuses on illocutionary discourse activities. In addition, these considerations infer the behavior of the commissioner's illocutionary discourse depicted in the TV setting. The actions found 30 data in the TV series "The Diplomat" are involved committing, promising, swearing, threatening, swearing, accepting, agreeing, refusing, offering, assuring, contracting, and betting.

The sentence form represents the current address of the investigation. The film uses explanatory, basic, and interrogative forms. These forms generally use the declarative form because characters in TV series have packets of questions that the characters need to answer as they speak. Given that form is the subject of this thought, it elaborates on the importance of pragmatics in daily practice. In other words, analysts may already be paying attention to the reaction of speakers or listeners based on how they present their discourse.

With questions and statements, or with commands to withdraw consideration, can assist the character in having coherent communication.

5.2. Recommendation

As long as the thinking is conducted, analysts add proposals to those who will use proportional research, very pragmatic. More questions are needed about the idea of applying the act of commissioner illocutionary discourse to communication in society, especially among English-speaking societies. This is often due to the fact that English is widely spoken throughout the world and has established itself as an international dialect so that an understanding of English is required, usually ascribed to the reasoning methods that English is widely connected throughout the world and has become a universal language, asking for an understanding of dialects, especially when recognizing the suggested meaning of a person. Communication settings have an influence on research findings when coercive illocutionary speech acts are used, because clear discourse settings provide diverse categories of meaning and understanding. In addition, to downplay literary theft, analysts expect that other analysts will use a clear object of thought.
